English

The battle was short but very fierce. When it was over, King Diomedes and his men lay dead. Heracles ran back to the horses, only to find they had eaten his friend. In a furious rage, he fed the King to them. The horses then became calm and very docile. He led them to the ship and sailed back to King Eurystheus.

King Eurystheus was terrified of the horses. "Take the horrid things away," he screamed. Heracles led them out of the palace and set them free in the mountains.

The Amazon Queen's Belt

"My daughter," King Eurystheus said to Heracles, "wants the belt Queen Hippolyta always wears around her waist. Go and get it for her."

When Heracles's friends heard he was going to the Amazons, they all wanted to go with him. The Amazons were a race of fierce women warriors who lived on the Black Sea. Everyone had heard stories about them but no one had ever seen them.

Heracles chose a band of the bravest men and they boarded a ship one morning, setting sail for a long voyage. At last they saw land. "Arm yourselves, men," shouted Heracles, "and be ready to fight."

When the ship reached the shore, Heracles and his men were surprised to see a group of women walking along the sand, smiling and waving. "You are very welcome here," cried the leader. "I am Queen Hippolyta. Come to my palace for food and wine." Heracles and his men were delighted not to have to fight a battle.

At the palace, Heracles told Hippolyta why he had come. "You may have my belt as a present," she said, smiling at him. The goddess Hera was watching, and was furious that this task was to be so easy for Heracles. She whispered in the other women's ears, "Beware, Heracles has come to harm Queen Hippolyta."

The Amazon women believed her and, snatching up their swords and spears, they attacked Heracles. His men fought bravely and, in the thick of the battle, Heracles killed Hippolyta.

"Run back to the ship," he shouted to his men and, grabbing Hippolyta's belt, Heracles raced to the beach. The Amazon women chased them but they managed to sail away safely. Heracles had the precious belt, but he was very sad that he had killed Hippolyta for it.

Eurystheus's daughter was delighted with the belt, but the King growled at Heracles, "You have more tasks to do."

The Cattle of Geryon

"Go to King Geryon, the three-headed ogre, and bring his cattle back here," ordered King Eurystheus. Next day, Heracles sailed across from Greece to North Africa. Trudging along the coast, he grew so hot, he angrily fired an arrow at Helios, the god of the sun. Helios was amused by such boldness, and cooled down the sun's rays. When Heracles reached the place where he had to cross the sea, Helios sent down a huge golden bowl that floated on the water. Heracles climbed in the strange boat and drifted across to Geryon's kingdom.

He pulled the golden boat up the beach and went in search of the cattle. Soon he saw them high up on a hill. As he climbed up to them, a huge dog with two heads leapt out at him, snarling and growling. Heracles waited until it was close, raised his club and killed it with one mighty blow.

He was driving the cattle down the hill when King Geryon came rushing after him, shouting angrily. Heracles fitted an arrow into his bow and shot Geryon, killing him instantly. Heracles drove the cattle down to his golden bowl boat, loaded them on board and sailed away.

When, many weeks later, Heracles drove King Geryon's cattle into the palace yard, King Eurystheus took no notice of the cattle and just complained that Heracles had been away far too long.

Main Task: Explain the authors choice

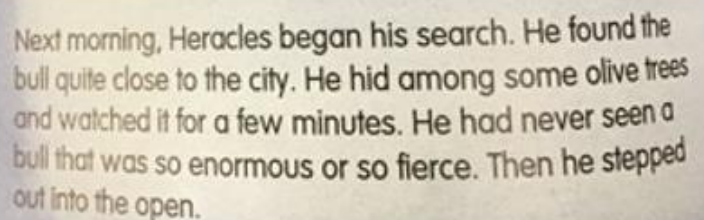

1. Why has the author called it 'The Amazon Queen's Belt'?
2. A) Why does the author end each story with the King jumping back into the brass pot? B) What kind of character is King Eurystheus?
3. Why does Heracles say 'Arm yourselves, men and be ready to fight.'?
4. Why did Helios cool down the sun after Heracles shot arrows at him?
5. How does the author show that King Eurystheus doesn't like Heracles?

Challenge: Explain how Helios helped Heracles to complete the task 'The Cattle of Geryon'.

Reading Skills

Fact or Opinion:

1. Heracles found the bull near the city.
2. The bull was large.
3. Heracles was not afraid of the bull.
4. Heracles waiting for the bull for a long time.
5. Heracles is the strongest man in the world.

Next morning, Heracles began his search. He found the bull quite close to the city. He hid among some olive trees and watched it for a few minutes. He had never seen a bull that was so enormous or so fierce. Then he stepped out into the open.

He pulled the golden boat up the beach and went in search of the cattle. Soon he saw them high up on a hill. As he climbed up to them, a huge dog with two heads leapt out at him, snarling and growling. Heracles waited until it was close, raised his club and killed it with one mighty blow.

He was driving the cattle down the hill when King Geryon came rushing after him, shouting angrily. Heracles fitted an arrow into his bow and shot Geryon, killing him instantly. Heracles drove the cattle down to his golden bowl boat, loaded them on board and sailed away.

The Golden Apples

"You must now bring me three golden apples from the Tree of Hesperides," King Eurystheus commanded Heracles. Heracles had no idea where the Tree was and begged the goddess Athene to help him.

"You'll find it in a sacred grove in the mountains at the end of the Earth," said Athene. Heracles thanked her and, after many months, he reached the Earth's end and saw Atlas, who held up the sky. "How can I get the golden apples?" Heracles asked Atlas. "Go to the Tree and kill the dragon which guards them. Then come back here. Only I can pick the apples," said Atlas, groaning under the weight of the sky.

Heracles thanked him and crept into the sacred grove to the Tree. Coiled around its trunk was a golden dragon with golden eyes. It glared at Heracles, daring him to come near. Heracles shot it with a poisoned arrow. Then he went back to Atlas.

"Hold the sky for me, while I go and pick the apples," said Atlas. Heracles did as Atlas said, and Atlas went away and came back with three golden apples. "Hang onto the sky a bit longer and I'll take them to King Eurystheus for you," said Atlas. Heracles suspected a trick; he thought Atlas would never return and he'd have to hold up the sky forever.

"Thank you," said Heracles, "but, before you go, could you just help me to make the weight more comfortable. Take it for a moment while I settle my cloak on my shoulders." And he passed the sky to Atlas. When he was free, Heracles picked up the three golden apples, said goodbye to Atlas, and hurried back to King Eurystheus.

Guard Dog of the Underworld

"Your last task is the most difficult of all," King Eurystheus said to Heracles. "Go to the Underworld and bring back Cerberus, the fierce three-headed dog which guards its gates."

Heracles knew he couldn't find his way to the Underworld on his own. He again asked the goddess Athene for help and she sent Hermes, the gods' messenger, to guide him. Together, they walked through tunnels to the black River Styx which you had to cross to get into the Underworld.

There Charon, an old boatman, refused to take them across. "You know I can only take dead people," he said grumpily. Heracles argued with him for so long that Charon agreed to ferry him across, but not Hermes.

On the other side of the river, Heracles walked through more misty tunnels, past drifting ghosts of the dead. At last, he saw Hades, the King of the Underworld, and Persephone, sitting on their misty thrones. "Please may I take Cerberus away with me?" he asked.

"You may take the dog, but you must return it unharmed," said Hades. Heracles thanked Hades and hurried to the Underworld's gates where Cerberus stood guard. The dog's three heads barked and growled at him.

Heracles crouched, waiting. When Cerberus leapt at him, he wrestled with the dog until it lay still, exhausted.

Then he dragged the dog back to the River Styx, into the boat, and then all the way back to King Eurystheus's palace.

When the King saw the dog, growling and snarling, he screamed with fright and jumped into his pot again. "There," shouted Heracles, "I've completed my tasks. I'm no longer your slave. I am free," and he dragged Cerberus back to the Underworld.

Then he went to the temple of the gods and knelt in front of the priestess. "Heracles," she said, "you have proved you are strong and very brave. You are forgiven for killing your children."

Heracles thanked her and quietly left the temple. The gods and goddesses were so pleased with Heracles, they invited him to Mount Olympus. Zeus, his father, greeted him. "You have done well," he thundered. Heracles stayed in his palace for a while before leaving for many more adventures.
